Arnhem 2008, Springer Netherlands.Functional evaluation of the human cerebral cortex by magnetoencephalography. Magnetoencephalography (MEG) is a noninvasive technique which has recently been applied to the study of human brain activity. This paper presents the results of a study that focuses on the functional contribution of different areas of the human cerebral cortex by MEG source analysis. The data were obtained from 7 healthy subjects during a self-paced movement task. Evoked responses in the sensorimotor areas were found to be highly correlated with the motor activity of the hand. In contrast, responses in the visual areas were not related to motor activity but were rather modulated by the position of the eyes or head. The role of precuneus is discussed and is related to previous fMRI studies.Q: Accepted answer is from another user who changed titles - how to make sure we get the correct answer? We have a question that was posted by a different user and the answer accepted by that user is using a different formulation. How can we make sure we get the correct answer? Specifically, can the OP be contacted to confirm or deny that they intend the answer to be the correct one, and if so, can the answer be changed to reflect the correct formulation? A: There was a workflow change where the OP was able to mark an answer as a duplicate of one of their own questions - this workflow was lost when some of the functionality of the duplicator was disabled. I've fixed that now - you should see the new behavior in the next build. Application of a bioadhesive dosage form composed of polyanhydrohexitols as colon delivery system 595f342e71
